"The Woman Who Rocked the Cradle Ruled the World."

Such is the concluding sentence of a lecture delivered in Baltimore a few days since, by the beautiful and accomplished young lecturer, Miss Lillian S. McLean, who takes strong grounds against all of the theories and assumptions of the modern woman-righters. This sentiment has been generally accepted as a truism in all ages, from the days even prior to those of the ancients.

"When Adam delved and Eve span," or the necessity of tilling was imposed upon them, down to the present day, of the year of our Lord 1872. The foundations of all true greatness and influence are laid in the nursery and around the hearth-stone. But it is not of this acknowledged and all pervading—though indirect influence upon the destinies of society and the world, that we propose to write; for this caption admits of two meanings or interpretations, according to the stand point from which it may be viewed, and it is to the other one that we design to refer.

There was immense force of truth in the remark of Pericles when he said—"my wife rules me. I rule Athens. Athens rules Greece and Greece rules the world." And so frank and manly a confession of a truth, which, however, felt as truth in all well regulated families, is so slow to be acknowledged by many as such, can but lighten our admiration for the honesty and candor of the brave old Greek. If the inside history of the workings of all governments, ancient and modern, could be written and promulgated to the world, the self importance and dignity of the lords of creation would meet with a severe shock, to see how greatly the influence of woman (whether she "rocked a cradle," or not) has prevailed to shape and direct their policies and their destinies. Such a history would reveal the fact that instead of proud man's swaying the powers of States and deciding the fates of nations, there is ever "a power behind the throne," greater than the throne, "unseen generally but always active and potent. It would reveal, too, that all societies and combinations of men in all ages have been and are, in the condition of the South Carolina wag, who on arriving at the White Sulphur in company with his wife, signed his name on the register John Smith, A. M. L. L. D. U. P. G. Carrying himself with peculiar dignity to sustain his titles, it was several days before any of the guests who were agog to know the meaning of U. P. G., dared approach him to inquire. Finally, the ladies sent a committee to wait upon him and ask a solution of the problem; when he readily responded that it simply stood for "under petticoat government." The truth is that the whole world from Adam down to date, has ever been in "the same fix." These magic letters U. P. G., are written in characters of living light on every page of its history, and there is no rubbing them out!

Thus, it appears that the witty caption of this article, though in one sense a truism, in another is at fault in not being broad enough. Hence we move an amendment, so as to make it read, that "women who rock the cradle, with material aid and assistance from those who do not thus rock, rule the world." All in favor of this amendment can make it known by subscribing for the Appeal.

Madame de Staël, in angling for a compliment from the great Napoleon, asked him who was the greatest woman in France, and was met by the reply from the man of destiny, that she was the greatest who had reared the greatest number of children. This may have been true in France and in Bonaparte's day—but it will be readily acknowledged that in our times there are many unblest with such large and flourishing families of hopefuls, who are powers in themselves. To sum up the whole matter, woman is not only the great power of earth, but laconically speaking, in all respects she is a good egg.—Petersburg Appeal.

A LIVELY AGENT.—Day before yesterday an itinerant book peddler of Council Bluffs with several rough adventures on the ferry boat and on the Union Pacific bridge. The particulars, as we learned them at the Police Court this morning, are as follows:

The book peddler was crossing the river on the ferry boat from Omaha to the Iowa side. At the same time a couple of roughs were on board the craft, and one of them accosted the peddler, telling him he was broke, and asking him for a half dollar. He pulled out his pocket-book, which contained some sixty or seventy dollars, and handed the rough the half dollar. Just as he was about to replace his money in his pocket the other rough grabbed it and knocked him overboard into the river.

The hands of the boat immediately rushed to the rescue, and succeeded in fishing the drowning man out; but while they were so engaged the bold villains had made good their escape by jumping from the boat, which had in the mean time sufficiently neared the other shore for them to jump off and run away. The book peddler on leaving the boat proceeded to the transfer, and took a train to Omaha, where he has friends, and of whom he intended to get some money. When the transfer train came along middle of the bridge the conductor came along and demanded his fare, but not having a cent with him, the train was stopped and he was put off. The cars moved on, and he was left in the middle of the bridge, soaking wet from top to bottom, and shivering in the cold winds that swept down along the river with piercing sharpness.

The book peddler determined to go ahead and foot it to Omaha. Upon reaching this end of the bridge he was halted by the eagle-eyed watchman, who refused to let him pass without a footman's check. Made desperate by his misfortune, the book peddler said "he'd be d—d if he would go back to Council Bluffs, but if he would reach Omaha if he had to fight for it," and a fight accordingly took place between the two, which grappled each other, and while scuffling fell over the trestle work and rolled to the bottom of the deep, frozen sand embankment, locked in each other's arms, a distance of some sixty or seventy feet. There the two men being again separated, and the book peddler triumphant came up town, where he obtained some money, and then returned to Council Bluffs, without making any complaint against any one.
